The objective	To expose students and research scholars to the expanding scope of linguistics in the 21st century, surpassing traditional grammar knowledge. To present research methodology in linguistics, from introspection to data-driven, community-based, and tech-enabled methods.
Description of the activity	The lecture framed linguistics as a multidimensional field, not just grammar, and explored the structural dimension along with socio-cultural, ecological, and computational dimensions. Common misconceptions in linguistics were addressed; a brief historical evolution was provided; professional avenues were outlined; language documentation in the Indian context was introduced; and current interdisciplinary aspects of the field were highlighted. The session served as a portal into the vast, living architecture of linguistics, traversing its structural foundations, ecological resonances, social textures, and AI-driven computational frontiers—presenting language not merely as a system of rules but as memory, biodiversity, and a living ecosystem of human knowledge.

Benefit/Key outcome of the event	The session exposed participants to current trends in the field and prepared them to plan and carry out research projects in linguistics or language-related studies.
